

Pentecost & Prosperity
The Ethics of Pentecostal-Charismatic Movements
HDS 3251
Fall Term 2014

Professor Jonathan L. Walton

Course Description

Pentecostal-Charismatic movements represent the fastest growing segments of global Christianity. The aim of this lecture course is to trace the historical and ethical formations of such movements in several global contexts, including, but not limited to, the United States, Latin America, West Africa, and South Korea. We will pay particular attention to rationales for conversion and commitment, perceived social and/or political capital that believers accrue, as well as a theological basis for a "prosperity lifestyle" and consumerist ethic.

Course Requirement

Attendance; Completion of assigned reading; one in-class group presentation; critical reading journals due at assigned dates (1 page per reading date; i.e. 2 pages per week); and your choice between a.) a critical essay to be submitted at the end of the semester based on a the particular ways Pentecostalism has taken root and made a social impact upon an identified community b.) three sermons (4 pages double-spaced per sermon) that address from a theological/ethical perspective the implications of Charismatic renewal on so-called "mainline communities,” or c.) four editorials addressing a pressing/relevant topic with the intent of publication about the theological and political impact of Pentecostalism. Each editorial should address a distinct community and/or theme; i.e., healing and access to healthcare in rural communities, gender politics of Pentecostalism and domestic violence, or economic inequality and the role of the prosperity gospel....(One per week beginning at week 7. Each editorial should be 700-1200 words.)
